Who we are and what we do

For 50 years the CPSC has worked to protect people from unsafe consumer products through science, investigation, corrective action, and communication. CPSC's work has contributed significantly to the decline in the rate of deaths and injuries associated with consumer products. Learn More...

How we do it

We combine three important functions in one easy-to-use website to improve consumer product safety:

1. Reporting. We collect reports of harm or potential harm about dangerous or potentially unsafe consumer products. Each report is reviewed by our staff of investigators and consumer product safety experts to determine what actions should be taken to protect the American public. Your report could provide information that may contribute to CPSC's decision to seek a product recall, seek penalties against any person or firm, or create new safety regulations or take other action authorized by law. Learn More...
2. Search. We publish unsafe product reports in a searchable, public database. You can search through these reports to find out whether any products in your home, or that you may be thinking about buying, could pose a risk to you or your family. You can also download all of the data we publish on the public database. Search Reports...
3. Business Engagement. We give businesses the opportunity to respond to reports about potentially dangerous consumer products. Businesses that manufacture, import, and label consumer products receive notifications if any of their products are reported. Businesses can respond to these notifications and may have their comments published along with the reports in the database. Learn More...
